LOUISIANA.

By Compatriot Henry S. Jaynes.

Long o'er a map Napoleon, brooding, bent,
And Louisiana scanned with troubled glance;
That Province, late restored by Spain to France,
Surpassed Rome's greatest conquest, in extent;
There might his wild ambition find its vent,
There rear an Empire—in a vast expanse—
An Empire that, resistless, should advance
And bring beneath its sway the Continent.
His thoughts then turned unto our proffered gold,
Which, if accepted, would his wars prolong;
The Province was remote, near it were Britons' bold
That o'er its northern border soon might throng.
He seized a pen, and Louisiana sold!
What France then lost made us a Nation strong.

1871

FOREWORD.

In this one hundredth year of the existence of the Louisiana Purchase as a part of the American domain, the Society is at last able to announce the enrollment of its one hundredth member, and this gratifying result furnishes the reason for deferring until now the issue of the Year Book. Another cause for felicitation is the appearance on our program of the names of two eminent non-members—President Dowling, who has given us the benefit of his learning on the early French explorers, and Capt. Chittenden, a distinguished writer and authority on certain phases of western history.

It is indeed most fitting that this Nebraska Society should observe the centennial of the Louisiana Purchase, and should make the history of that region the subject of its current year's work. We of the middle west must trace our territorial chain of title, not from England (for this region was never subject to that power) but from France. And it is the story of Louisiana, with its shifting changes of government and laws, rather than that of the eastern states, that forms the real prologue to our territorial as distinguished from racial history, and which furnishes the foundation for that exhaustive study of our own state's development, which we hope, another year, to enter upon.

It is for this reason that the authorities relating to the history of Louisiana have been collected for this work with more than the usual care. These are intended, it may be well to repeat, not alone for those who write papers, but for all the members, to use and study. Nothing would add more to the interest and value of our meetings than a general effort on the part of our members to post themselves in advance on the subjects to be discussed in the papers.

It is to be regretted that there is no one book which treats at once briefly and adequately the entire history of Louisiana. Mr. Hosmer's recent work is recommended for the period of the purchase, and that of Marbois for the earlier epochs. But the concise and comprehensive treatise that shall cover the ground from the time of the Spanish and French explorers to the present hour is yet to be written. This Year Book is an attempt to supply the want by making accessible the books which treat the subject in parcels.
